The Fall of UK

~ Yours in wandering,

Death to The World

UK politicians are receiving thousands of pounds in gifts, including luxurious dinners, from arms firms [3]. They continue to pledge rapid replenishment of weapon stocks to sustain aid to Ukraine [42]. Meanwhile, investments by members of Parliament in the weapon and tobacco sectors are on the rise [43], further padding their pockets [6].

Meat consumption levels are now at a record low since the indicator was first introduced [41]. This is occurring as we see high levels of inflation in products comparable to the 2008 depression [28]. Meanwhile, food is now being printed, with the UK government implementing its use nationwide and heavily investing in the technology [31]. Lab-grown meat, which is estrogenic, is being labeled as "real meat" [2], perpetuating the chemical warfare on your hormonal health.

Amidst these developments, you might ask yourself, where do these ideas originate? Why are they enforced? This article will not delve into those questions; these are issues YOU, as a citizen of your country, are responsible for investigating. As you read between the lines and consider the word usage, breaking through the propaganda of the 2030 agenda [44], you will, in fact, notice that this agenda closely mirrors what George Orwell warned about in "1984." When abused in its vagueness, it can be weaponized like no other policy.

As you find yourself questioning why the government seemingly has it out for you, your money is abruptly yanked from beneath you. Banks such as Metro Bank selling their 3 billion-pound mortgage book due to insolvency [32]. Further enforcing that all UK banks are struggling.

Keeping your money in the bank seems like a gamble. While the media turns a blind eye to the banks' solvency issues, job cuts and reductions continue unhindered in the banking sector. To address interest rates, the UK government opts for quantitative tightening—the so-called "economic medicine" that acts as a stimulant. This process is meant to increase the money supply, lower interest rates, and ideally, stimulate economic activity. At least, that is the theory. It's an action that must be timed correctly and will, either way, lead to a decrease in asset prices. Nevertheless, they then boast when interest rates have a minimal decline—a trend due to falling oil prices, a simple case of mathematics of energy in and energy out—while they pat themselves on the back.

Amidst their boasting and extravagant parties funded by taxpayers and weapons manufacturers, there is an expansion of gender boundaries and the promotion of other "open" values, often resulting in a push of morality to its opposite extreme—a phenomenon that frequently occurs during the decline of civilizations, as seen throughout history in examples such as the late Roman Empire, the Qing Dynasty, and pre-revolutionary France.

While they give speeches about YOU, the people, needing to "feel the pain as we strive for net zero," your hard work won't pay off, no matter how much effort you put in. So, why try?

Welcome to hell amid the weak individualism prevalent in this Fourth Turning cycle—a period marked by spiritual renewal and rebellion against the established order. Prepare to ignite a renaissance by breaking free from the Prussian brainwashing and becoming a true individual, capable of critical thinking and abstract reasoning.

Will you trace the threads of degradation? And what of the design within the correlation? And more importantly, do you dare understand the puppeteer's hand of causation?

Naivety of The People and Misplaced Trust

The people once benefited from placing their trust in institutions, but this is no longer the case. These institutions no longer have the best interests of the people at heart, nor are they being held accountable for their covert actions. The trust we once placed in institutions must now be redirected—perhaps towards each other. However, trust in ordinary people is just as compromised, due to the presence of thought police. These enforcers of immoral extremism further the divide of the populace, noticeably impacting how individuals treat one another.

Divide and conquer. A clear example of this being observed in theocratic societies, such as Iran. So, who can we trust...?

A country in which is deemed a failed state, where you will be arrested for praying[22] or even thinking—the very country that birthed the "Magna Carta." Perhaps we should now say it has given way to the "Servitutis Exigua Carta."

Once upon a time, there was a period when trust in governments and media was the norm. What happened? People who have built their lives on habits formed in an era that seemed trustworthy must now confront the reality that these entities can no longer be trusted.

Now, a single medical emergency will derail your entire life. The demand for mortgages in the UK is at its lowest since 1995[34], amidst rising prices and plans for the incorporation of smart cities.

Amid BRICS nations cutting their supplies, limiting exports, and dumping US treasuries, it becomes apparent that banks are essentially bankrupt. Should they be required to liquidate immediately, none would be able to meet their obligations. These high interest rates are likely to become the norm as markets falter, and the government, preoccupied with climate change propaganda to advance its policies, is doing little to address these collapsing markets. With this propaganda being prevalent in things such as ESG scores, it prompts the question; Where have your oil refineries gone? What have they become?^[24]

Now, consider how these problems will worsen with the approaching winter and rising energy costs. Some households have resorted to using oil-fired burners^[37]. And, if you're guessing what comes next, yes, these too have now been banned. The use of oil-fired burners will not be allowed in the UK in the coming years.

What has transpired with the British population over these years? There has been an increase in the rainbow peoples demographic, especially among those aged 16-24, with 4.4% identifying as such^[19]. It's observable that the proportion of rainbow people tends to decrease as one moves away from densely populated cities.

Additionally, there has been a continuous influx of immigrants into the country, yet there is no UK-wide policy or framework for immigration integration. Consequently, at times, these individuals may act contrary to the law and British values^[5], which is also attributed to this lack of integration.

While all this is happening, there are cyber attacks targeting pensions^[29]. Banks provide excuses as to why they cannot protect you or return your money, prioritizing only their interests—essentially stealing the money you've worked your entire life for, regardless of the true source of the attack. Then the government tells you to worry about these attacks. And what have we learned about the government? When the government tells you to worry about X, you probably shouldn't worry. But when they say not to worry about Y, THAT is when you should be concerned. That's the level of trust we have reached.

When the UK left the EU after being part of it for so long, the reasons given included sovereignty, concerns over immigration, the UK's substantial economic contributions, excessive regulations on businesses and everyday life, the dilution of UK national identity, a perceived lack of democracy within the EU, and the compelling campaign narrative of "taking back control." We are witnessing the socioeconomic implications of this "taking back control" unfold. This move has given rise to the opposite extremes they initially sought to remedy. Having left the economic support of the EU, the UK will continue to endure significant hardship, no longer bolstered by the same imperial power it once wielded.

Today, as we observe a global rise in abusive control, the UK's reclaimed control is also exploited, leading to monetary policies that are further along in the agenda than those of the Eurozone—perhaps due to a lower risk of certain positions being compromised in the EU compared to the UK parliament. As Richard Werner^[45] has stated, "The euro has never made economic sense. It is purely political, and even that rationale is flawed—'you need the euro to unite Europe' is their argument."

These powers have even gone to the extent of ensuring that when the banks fail, they absorb the people's money in the aftermath. This is known as the bail-in law^[17], the vacuum bomb of the financial world—siphoning off people's money when the banks go bankrupt. This law has been implemented in all G20^[46] countries.

As we begin to observe, we are on the brink of witnessing the largest transfer of wealth in history! You might wish it were directed towards you, the taxpayer, but unfortunately, it is not. HSBC bank alone will close 114 branches^[49] in 2023, with many others following suit due to their insolvency. Meanwhile, the government assures the public not to worry, claiming everything is under control, all while not disclosing the people who are withdrawing from the banks in cash.

With America's amnesia spreading to the UK, people seem to forget. Was your gold standard ever made illegal? What happened to your Sovereign^[48], which is even exempt from taxes?

Bankruptcies have surged following the lockdowns, attributable to the multitude of issues presented in this article. The insolvency numbers are now comparable to those of the 2008 recession. The period moving forward is marked by policies enacted when small businesses emerged and subsequently failed, altering the flow of money. To where I wonder?

Source: [14]

With the implementation of predatory monetary policies as a central topic, one wonders if the covert desire for a banking crisis is precisely to introduce Central Bank Digital Currencies (CBDCs)—the epitaph of self-autonomy and individuality—or whether they will emerge as an excuse for the alleged cyber-attacks.

And to ensure you and your family do not discuss these issues, the government has passed the Online Safety Bill[13]. This bill essentially permits the government to read all messages, including those on WhatsApp and Signal. With Signal[27] stating that they are exiting the UK market to avoid compromising user data in any way. This surveillance is facilitated through Ofcom, the government-sanctioned communications office, which now also polices the internet. The law mandates online platforms to employ government-approved software to scan all users' photos, files, and messages for "illegal" content. It also facilitates the use of this data in the implementation of a digital ID system.

And what about your welfare health system? I wonder if the experts of this national cheapcare system (NHS), have upheld their promises post-Brexit? Being the fifth[47] largest employer in the world, attending to over 7 000 patients every minute, and pledging £350 million[16] a week for the NHS—professing "promise made, promise delivered."

There was a time when student nurses felt honored to be accepted into the NHS. The elderly recall when waiting lists were virtually nonexistent. Nurses took pride in their uniforms, and their training was practical and high-quality. With the NHS once being the jewel inside the crown of United Kingdom. Now? It's been plundered and its workers indoctrinated from an early "education" to conform to a particular behavior—a behavior that has led to the denial of service we witness today, along with a persistent evasion of accountability. This gives rise to the question: What kills more—the "unintentional" deaths through the healthcare system or natural diseases?[33]

Roy Lilley[23], a former NHS Trust Chairman, noted that before Flu-19, there were 4.5 million people on waiting lists, with an estimated 40 000 nursing vacancies. Post-pandemic? Over 40 000 nurses have resigned before retirement age, with thousands more looking likely to leave. With the waiting lists having ballooned to over 10 million.

Nurses are striking over the concern of dangerous practices due to staffing shortages. The UK's "death care system," after over 10 years of flatlined funding, has resulted in what we see now. Personnel are being recruited from impoverished areas[30], creating a morally dubious situation as the communities they leave suffer[36]—just like all the other implemented band-aid solutions for a gaping, bleeding wound.

The current NHS leadership, lacking backgrounds in healthcare, prefer to invest in data-driven software and service integration without a clear implementation plan—or, for that matter, any plan—rather than focusing on the humanitarian aspect of patient care. In a time when “the sun never set” on the British Empire, every nurse knew each other and all their patients—their motto? Exceptional hospitals are the foundation of great nations. Now, this obsession with data collection is encroaching on clinical practice time. All the while, they push vaccine deaths on to pregnant females[1], despite the companies behind the vaccines stating that they have never been tested for prevention[35]. With even virtual wards being implemented, and some old patients being left to ponder if their data will rain down from their clouds. But the realization came too late for the former trust chairman, who began to understand that solving the prevailing issues meant detaching the NHS from the grip of government control.

What has become of the past NHS’s infection control? Nowadays, everything is confined within prison-like buildings, without the routine cleaning of clothes, and the lack of dignified, honorable uniforms of the past.

These striking medics[26], who make Judas appear as Jesus, underscore a deeper issue. The indoctrination of these individuals within educational programs—to the extent that the Hippocratic Oath has become a Hypocrisy Oath—has led to astronomical legal costs arising from cases of patient negligence[10], such as the “accidental” deaths of infants[39]. All the while, they boldly proclaim, “I was just doing my job.”

Educational programs that offer visas to illegal-immigrants who come to the country to study. Choosing to overstay their visas, taking advantage of the opportunity just because they can. Meanwhile, this educational system is increasingly adopting a model similar to the Chinese system. An approach that produces excellent worker drones, yet leaves them incapable of critical thinking, prompts professors within that system to question and emphasize the importance of this skill. However, what is now referred to as critical thinking was once considered common sense. Observe how we have declined to the point where common sense is now labeled as critical thinking.

Only thoughts and reasoning that directly benefit the government are permitted. This indoctrination, implemented through a standardized curriculum everyone must follow, stifles the expansion of the mind, thereby hindering the potential for a renaissance. What happened to the mentoring and love for education fostered by the older and wiser population, not based on an imposed curriculum?

The taxes you pay becoming the foundation for establishing this imprisonment of the soul. What else, then, do institutions use their money for—both from the individual and the taxpayer? They claim philanthropic pursuits, but one has to wonder what truly lies behind this guise.

With health of soul, mind, and body as the foundation of our existence, we are observing a rising trend of individuals emigrating from their home country[9], particularly those who have the means to do so. Amidst this decline of health, caused by factors such as asthma medication[15], with rates becoming 20%[18], and subsequent data suppression after 2012[4], can we blame people for leaving? Can we fault them for wanting freedom, for desiring a better quality of life, and for wishing to remain unaffected by the chemical warfare that seeks to control them?

And yet, these are the individuals you trusted to deliver what you wanted. Did these people fight in your wars? Did they keep the best interests of the people in mind? Do they even understand the issues? The ones who have advocated for this inhumane approach to everything—to “optimize” our system? Ah yes, the pursuit of capitalistic monetary gain through the guise of efficiency, all while disregarding the moral and ethical implications. Do you truly believe we lack the funds to resolve these problems, or is it that the solutions would directly impede their quest for absolute leadership?

If these governmental figures were so competent, you would imagine they could prevent a council from going bankrupt[11]—with Birmingham[40] having already joined the list.

Now imagine how much worse it will become as the cold approaches. Furthermore, you won't be able to escape on vacation to save costs. Why? Because of taxation on flying, reduced competition leading to higher prices, and increased regulations from specific entities that add to the expenses. Now, there are fewer slots available per flight, and measures such as carbon tax are starting to be implemented. These regulations benefit those profiting from them, but they have adverse effects on the general public. According to the gospel of the C40 city regulations[7], the aim is to limit individuals to one flight every three years, covering only up to 330 miles based on the carbon allowances they receive. Do you realize how little 330 miles is? Do you think you will be flying for this distance? I quote, with "trains and boats". And if you don't use your allowance, you can sell it to wealthier individuals, allowing them to fly farther than you. These "districts," as they call them, will be all you are able to travel to.

The most telling sign of all, encapsulating the entire degradation of UK, is the immoral and weaponized sexual orientation movement. With Stonewall standing as the flag bearer, churning out indoctrinated individuals associated with countless organizations, including the NHS[38]. And their role? Serving as useful pawns[8], charged with creating unrest within the broader domestic population. But, what do you think causes these people to not only act a certain way but also to transition? Why are they on the rise? And why do some countries go to such lengths as to execute these people?[25] This trend cannot be solely attributed to the so-called "openness" advocated by their communities. Although no humane individual advocates for the killing of another, it is worth contemplating why one would resort to such extremes and the rationale behind such actions.

And yet, my children, you give them the leash to your health, letting them dictate what health is defined as. Have you ever examined the politics behind everything you eat, while questioning why it is deemed acceptable for you to eat it? You are defined by what you eat, and consequently, by the responsibility you take for that consumption.

Economists outside the echo chamber of the World Economic Forum (WEF), including those banned from it, are expressing a similar sentiment: an economic collapse being certain. The current discussion revolves around when this inevitability will occur and the severity of its impact.

I have introduced only a few factors contributing to the decline of this society and, consequently, other countries. Am I portraying a biased view? What are my intentions in displaying these few factors indicative of the downfall of many future nations? It is all for one reason: to prompt you to question the reality you accept as a reality. It is easy to overlook something when you are so close to it or if you have any particular attachment to it. What is this called? Naivety!

But don't trust my words; trust your government when they say, "When global energy supplies are disrupted and weaponized by the likes of Putin, we have seen household bills soar and economic growth slow around the world." [20] They continue with, "By Putin cutting off the energy, he has weakened our economy and that of Europe." [20] Surely, the government doesn't believe you are stupid? Everyone knows that they sanctioned the energy and said we need to cut off funding to Russia due to the conflict in Europe[12][21]. Did you perhaps forget they said this? And in that same article, they continue with, "Technology to cut emissions today should be the priority – from electric vehicle charging points.” Where do they think electricity comes from? In this purposeful causation of starvation, they conclude with, “A good government goes all in on renewables.”[20] Just as you’ve forgotten their words, you also believe that Russia had the incentive to blow up their own oil pipeline—a narrative promoted by puppet Germany, a country that hasn’t achieved sovereignty since World War II. If they are not a sovereign nation, then who holds the strings? Na-iv-it-y!

You are naive! Those among you who are already aware of these issues have chosen silence, allowing the very forces you despise to corrupt society. You are cowards! Now, watch as the people who take action pave the way for your children, to at least attempt to reclaim our stolen valor from those who do not care about you—having stolen all your assets, collateralized debts, and derivatives. What remains? Certainly not your health or your mind.
